H.E. praised the role of Iraqi elites and competent figures in overcoming the challenges that Iraq faced politically, security-wise, and socially. H.E. emphasized that Iraq, in the eyes of others, differs from how Iraqis immersed in daily details perceive it and that the region's and the world's view of Iraq is that it has recovered and is moving in the right direction. H.E. called on the elites to state the facts, explain the developments, and focus on the achievements accomplished, urging them to spread positivity, and optimism, and compare the past to the present.

H.E. stressed the importance of creating a memory of the past for future generations and informing them about what happened and the people's suffering from economic siege, systematic repression, and mass graves. Regarding freedoms, H.E. said that freedoms are constitutionally guaranteed and ensured as long as they do not intersect with the freedoms of others, stating that freedom of expression means speaking about truths, not lies and slander. Targeting symbols under the pretext of freedom is unacceptable, H.E. added, calling in this context for logical boundaries for freedom of expression that guarantee it and prevent rumors and lies. H.E. emphasized the need for balance between the two matters, explaining that Iraq needs media capable of shaping public opinion.
